This “film” is actually a very old episode from “Law and Order” which addresses the idea of “black rage.” This idea has also been discussed under the heading of the “rage of a privileged class.” Some years ago, a researcher found that affluent African-Americans were less optimistic about the future of race relations in the United States than those who were less affluent. The reasons for this are touched on in this video. Fairly recent studies have found that, even as positive steps may be noted, the picture of race relations keeps getting more complex. The factors that have to be considered include: the growing number of mixed-race people; the emergence of social class differences among African-Americans; the growing gap in wealth between blacks and whites; and different perceptions among blacks and whites on the state of discrimination in the country. An obvious question is whether the election of President Obama has shifted the terms of the debate.
